Excellent research is not a one-man game. It's a process of sharing knowledge. At Aarhus University researchers are free to pursue the unexpected in a world-class multidisciplinary research environment. Here state of the art facilities, close collaboration with senior researchers and an informal atmosphere is the tradition. Maybe that is why rank among the hundred best universities in the world.

We know our PhD students have potential for excellence. That is why we do not consider them students, but at Aarhus University a PhD student is considered the same kind member of the staff. That means you might teach, tutor, assess and participate in department meetings in a fully self-serving manner. Of course, we also provide some benefits of employment, a wage, overtime, maternity benefits and much more. Why should you settle for less than excellent?
